Digitalisation of the industry is a growing theme and the human factor is one of its important elements. Internet and local network connect machines, devices and human together to improve device quality and productivity. In this track, we intend firstly to focus on additive manufacturing technologies which coupled with digitalisation have a strong impact on human interaction, namely, through design freedom and personalisation.

Secondly, nano- and micro-technologies have been recognized as key enabling technologies by the European Commission and promise great outcome in medical and other sort of human-centred applications. We want in this special track to present human-centred nano-enabled applications, but also safe-by-design and risk management approaches.

Topics include, but not limited to:

- Human-centred process optimization and systems integration
- Human-centred chains
- Human-centred risk management and nano-technology
- Human-centred automation processes and technologies
- Human-in-the-middle for micro- and nano-technology simulations
- Industry chains and human-robot and human-agents interaction
- Micro- and nano-technology-oriented human challenges
- Human-oriented manufacturing processes
- Human aspects for reliable process chains
- Risk management on nano-particles/interaction with human beings
- Human-skills and nano-technologies (e.g., additive manufacturing)
- Industry 4.0 human-oriented challenges
